

Many of us visited the children at the Emiliano Zapata elementary school. The children are laughing, playing, studying and they look nice in their school clothes. It is easy to forget how different their lives are from the lives of our own children. A few photos of these same children at their homes helps to complete their story. These photos were emailed by the director of the school, at my request.

Tomorrow will be a mixed blessing for me. I will enjoy walking the streets and putting wool-caps on every child I see that is shivering in the cold. For some of the children I will have a warm sweater. It really is a lot of fun, until I run out of clothing. Then it is kind of sad. There are always kids waiting. They laugh and smile. Only a few show their disappointment.
