

Middle school raises more than $1,500 for Paper Houses Across the Border

By SARAH PARKER
News Editor

Children have always aspired to live in huge houses. Now, the generation that's grown up seeing "MTV Cribs" desire even more immense houses with all the superfluties they've seen in their favorite celebrity's home. The students of Rickey C. Bailey Middle School were shown a much bleaker real estate reality than what they've seen on MTV, when they recently saw photographs of cardboard houses in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. Bob Decker, founder of Paper Houses Across the Borders, a nonprofit charity that aids the citizens in the "colonias"—or neighborhoods—of the border towns, held the assembly especially to ask the students for their aide. Bailey students rushed to respond, raising more than $1,500 in just two weeks, hundreds more than the $1,234 necessary for the charity to feed a school cafeteria table of eight elementary students for a year in the border town.

The charity first drew band director Vic Flowers' attention before he was even at Bailey. He heard of the program from the founder's daughter, Jennifer Hicks. When Flowers moved at the beginning of the school year, he immediately took his idea to principal Veronica Vijil. "I knew that she would listen. I felt that it fit our philosophy on campus. We teach our kids to help others and to appreciate what they have," Flowers, who was the faculty sponsor for the project, said.

HOUSES, 2A

The Lopez children use discarded van seat to sit on while they eat their only meal with meat in it for the past week. They are part of family consisting of four generations that shares a cluster of cardboard and cinderblock rooms.

HOUSES

Continued from page 1A

Bob Decker, a sergeant who has served 35 years in law enforcement, 25 of those in the Houston Police Department, was on vacation four years ago when he came upon his first "paper house," but he can remember every indelible detail of this sight, one that forever changed his life.

"I was driving around looking for a Mexican restaurant. I was on a dirt road, and I saw a woman cooking over a campfire wearing a long skirt. In the background I saw a cardboard house."

He didn't dare believe his eyes.

"I thought, 'Surely, she can't be living in that cardboard house.' Here I was only 2 miles away from the border [of Del Rio, Texas]," Decker exclaimed. "I pulled up the hill where it crested and saw hundreds of these cardboard houses."

Decker began returning to Ciudad Acuña, which is located in the Mexican state of Coahuila, every other weekend, alternating with when he had to work distributing food among families and exploring all the border towns when he came upon the first organization to benefit from his charity and hard work.

"I found a children's orphanage that was out of everything except kids. The family that ran it explained they had ran this for 14 years, and for whatever reason, their sponsor was unable to take care of them. I [then] kept the place running every other weekend."

Eventually, people began to take notice of Decker's actions and decided to help. "People at my church—St. Joe's—and other [HPD] officers got involved and would go down with me to make trips," he explained. From there, Decker's operation—which was still-yet unnamed—took off. His Policemen's Union picked up on the story and provided funding to set up the organization that would become nonprofit charity Paper Houses Across the Border Inc.—or "Paper Houses," for short. "It was incredible," Decker said.

The newly christened organization quickly expanded in exactly the way its brief history dictated it would—as a result of Decker and Paper Houses' exploration.

"We went to Emiliano Zapata Elementary, which is on the side of a dirt road, to see if we could help with supplies. Again, we knew that the police officers would kick in if they needed [a great deal of supplies]."

Here, as in the first time he stumbled on a cardboard house sometime ago, the situation was much graver than he had ever feared possible.

"Three teachers told me the same thing independently of each other, in three separate rooms. Each teacher said, 'You know what we need more than supplies? We need some way to feed these children. They are passing out in class from hunger.

They can't focus in school because they are so hungry.' We started with 40 children—then 60—then 80. Then, a small church let us use their kitchen, and we were feeding 140 children," Decker said.

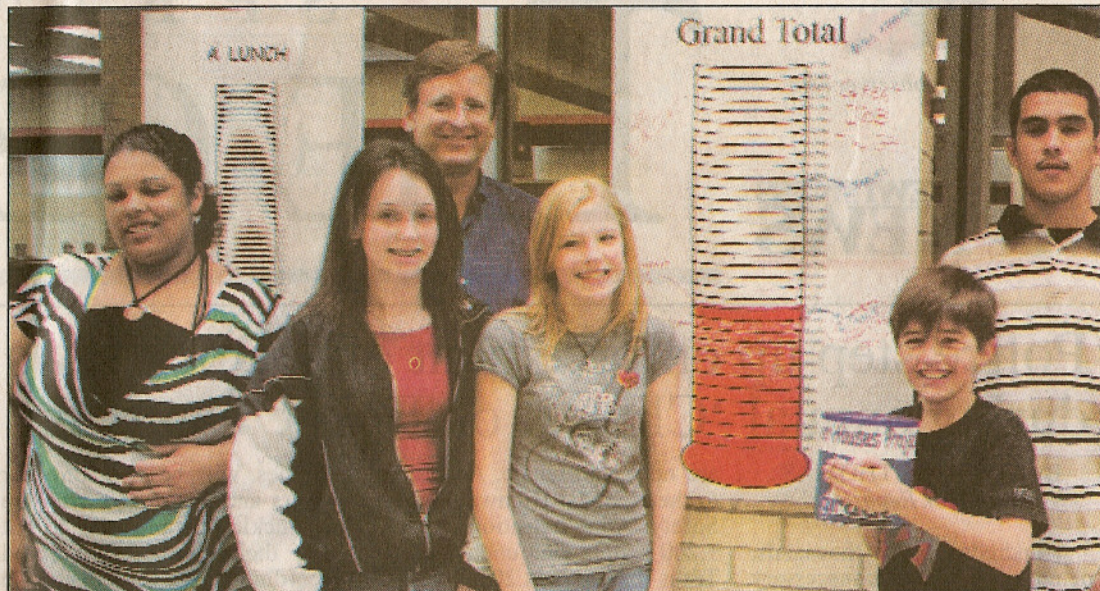

In November 2006, Paper Houses built a cafeteria for Zapata. At the time, according to Decker, that was the only school cafeteria in the entire state of Coahuila, which has a population of nearly 2.5 million people. "We were feeding 1,000 kids a day," he said. Less than six months later, Paper Houses built another cafeteria, this time at Garcia Morales Elementary, and another 1,000 kids were being fed a day there."

It was at this point in the charity's development that Bailey Middle got involved.

"It's something that inspires you: this is one man who saw a need," Vic Flowers said. "No one makes any money from it—every penny goes to food and medicine. The people who drive down there even pay for their own gas."

Decker agreed: "If someone mails in a dollar, that dollar literally goes to Mexico."

After Flowers talked to Vijil about it, Decker met with her and discussed the idea of speaking with her students about Paper Houses. "They have a dynamic principal over there at Bailey," Decker said of Vijil. He met with the students and explained the situation to them. "I told them, 'In order for me to feed eight children—a whole table—for an entire year, I need only $1,234. I'd love for you guys to sponsor a table." Decker said he left up to the students how to raise the money.

Bailey students are proud of surpassing their goal of collecting enough money to sponsor a table in a school cafeteria in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. From left are Ebony Washington, Sabrena Norris, faculty sponsor Vic Flowers, Morgan Hutchison, Ryan Luellen, Nick DeLeon and Trey Jeffries. Photo courtesy SISD

The response was overwhelming.

"The kids were all over it. What's great about this project is that it was kids helping kids. You could see a light in their eyes. It was really cool," Flowers said. He said that, in the school's daily assemblies, the kids were talked to about the charity and how important the cause is—along with how relatively close the problems are to home. "We talked to the children about what it would be like to not have food," he said. "We explained to them that, in America, we provide free lunches to those who cannot afford them. In Mexico, however, kids are passing out because of hunger."

They raised, according to Decker, $1,530. "With what was left over [after the $1,234 was taken out for the table,] I bought vitamins and medicine," he said, commending their efforts. "They were the first school in the U.S. to take this up." Bailey's faculty and staff got involved, too. "Several want to make a trip down there just for teachers," Decker said. He hopes Bailey's families will follow suit too. "The reason I set this up—the main purpose—was to help Americans. I want to do for them what's been done for me. It's been a life-altering experience. People keep coming back to help," he further explained.

Psychologists, teachers, parents, baby-sitters—virtually anybody who has dealt with them for extended periods will vehemently exclaim upon the selfishness of adolescents. Bailey Middle certainly provided a ringing example to the contrary.

For more information, view the Web site www.paperhouses.org

HOUSES

Continued from page 1A

Bob Decker, a sergeant who has served 35 years in law enforcement, 25 of those in the Houston Police Department, was on vacation four years ago when he came upon his first "paper house," but he can remember every indelible detail of this sight, one that forever changed his life.

"I was driving around looking for a Mexican restaurant. I was on a dirt road, and I saw a woman cooking over a campfire wearing a long skirt. In the background I saw a cardboard house."

He didn't dare believe his eyes.

"I thought, 'Surely, she can't be living in that cardboard house.' Here I was only 2 miles away from the border [of Del Rio, Texas]," Decker exclaimed. "I pulled up the hill where it crested and saw hundreds of these cardboard houses."

Decker began returning to Ciudad Acuña, which is located in the Mexican state of Coahuila, every other weekend, alternating with when he had to work distributing food among families and exploring all the border towns when he came upon the first organization to benefit from his charity and hard work.

"I found a children's orphanage that was out of everything except kids. The family that ran it explained they had ran this for 14 years, and for whatever reason, their sponsor was unable to take care of them. I [then] kept the place running every other weekend."

Eventually, people began to take notice of Decker's actions and decided to help. "People at my church—St. Joe's—and other [HPD] officers got involved and would go down with me to make trips," he explained. From there, Decker's operation—which was still-yet unnamed—took off. His Policemen's Union picked up on the story and provided funding to set up the organization that would become nonprofit charity Paper Houses Across the Border Inc.—or "Paper Houses," for short. "It was incredible," Decker said.

The newly christened organization quickly expanded in exactly the way its brief history dictated it would—as a result of Decker and Paper Houses' exploration.

"We went to Emiliano Zapata Elementary, which is on the side of a dirt road, to see if we could help with supplies. Again, we knew that the police officers would kick in if they needed [a great deal of supplies]."

Here, as in the first time he stumbled on a cardboard house sometime ago, the situation was much graver than he had ever feared possible.

"Three teachers told me the same thing independently of each other, in three separate rooms. Each teacher said, 'You know what we need more than supplies? We need some way to feed these children. They are passing out in class from hunger.

They can't focus in school because they are so hungry.' We started with 40 children—then 60—then 80. Then, a small church let us use their kitchen, and we were feeding 140 children," Decker said.

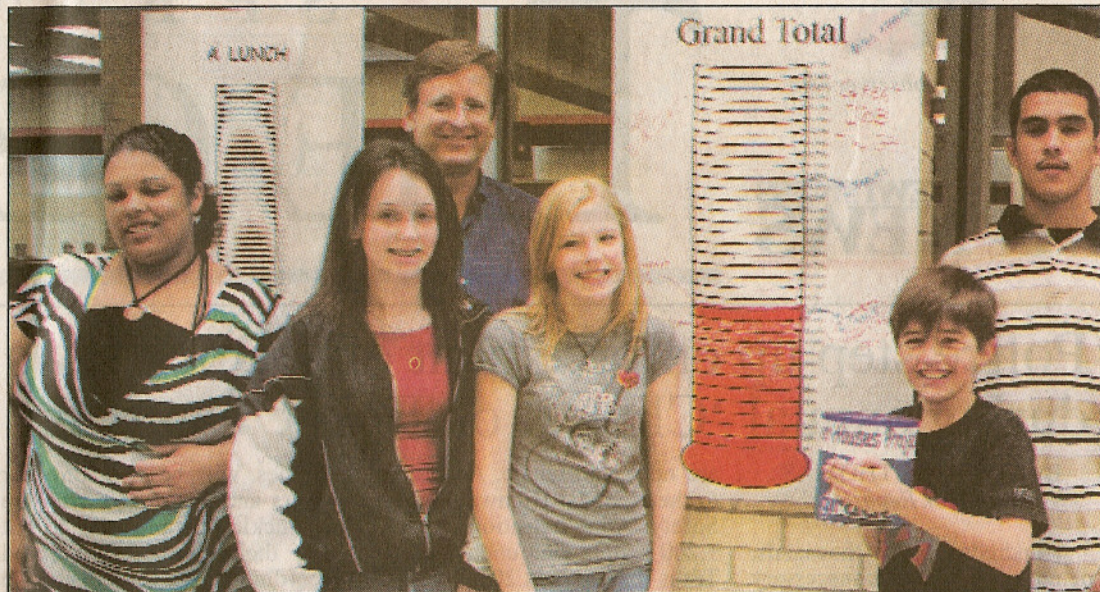

In November 2006, Paper Houses built a cafeteria for Zapata. At the time, according to Decker, that was the only school cafeteria in the entire state of Coahuila, which has a population of nearly 2.5 million people. "We were feeding 1,000 kids a day," he said. Less than six months later, Paper Houses built another cafeteria, this time at Garcia Morales Elementary, and another 1,000 kids were being fed a day there."

It was at this point in the charity's development that Bailey Middle got involved.

"It's something that inspires you: this is one man who saw a need," Vic Flowers said. "No one makes any money from it—every penny goes to food and medicine. The people who drive down there even pay for their own gas."

Decker agreed: "If someone mails in a dollar, that dollar literally goes to Mexico."

After Flowers talked to Vijil about it, Decker met with her and discussed the idea of speaking with her students about Paper Houses. "They have a dynamic principal over there at Bailey," Decker said of Vijil. He met with the students and explained the situation to them. "I told them, 'In order for me to feed eight children—a whole table—for an entire year, I need only $1,234. I'd love for you guys to sponsor a table." Decker said he left up to the students how to raise the money.

Bailey students are proud of surpassing their goal of collecting enough money to sponsor a table in a school cafeteria in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. From left are Ebony Washington, Sabrena Norris, faculty sponsor Vic Flowers, Morgan Hutchison, Ryan Luellen, Nick DeLeon and Trey Jeffries. Photo courtesy SISD

The response was overwhelming.

"The kids were all over it. What's great about this project is that it was kids helping kids. You could see a light in their eyes. It was really cool," Flowers said. He said that, in the school's daily assemblies, the kids were talked to about the charity and how important the cause is—along with how relatively close the problems are to home. "We talked to the children about what it would be like to not have food," he said. "We explained to them that, in America, we provide free lunches to those who cannot afford them. In Mexico, however, kids are passing out because of hunger."

They raised, according to Decker, $1,530. "With what was left over [after the $1,234 was taken out for the table,] I bought vitamins and medicine," he said, commending their efforts. "They were the first school in the U.S. to take this up." Bailey's faculty and staff got involved, too. "Several want to make a trip down there just for teachers," Decker said. He hopes Bailey's families will follow suit too. "The reason I set this up—the main purpose—was to help Americans. I want to do for them what's been done for me. It's been a life-altering experience. People keep coming back to help," he further explained.

Psychologists, teachers, parents, baby-sitters—virtually anybody who has dealt with them for extended periods will vehemently exclaim upon the selfishness of adolescents. Bailey Middle certainly provided a ringing example to the contrary.

For more information, view the Web site www.paperhouses.org

HOUSES

Continued from page 1A

Bob Decker, a sergeant who has served 35 years in law enforcement, 25 of those in the Houston Police Department, was on vacation four years ago when he came upon his first "paper house," but he can remember every indelible detail of this sight, one that forever changed his life.

"I was driving around looking for a Mexican restaurant. I was on a dirt road, and I saw a woman cooking over a campfire wearing a long skirt. In the background I saw a cardboard house."

He didn't dare believe his eyes.

"I thought, 'Surely, she can't be living in that cardboard house.' Here I was only 2 miles away from the border [of Del Rio, Texas]," Decker exclaimed. "I pulled up the hill where it crested and saw hundreds of these cardboard houses."

Decker began returning to Ciudad Acuña, which is located in the Mexican state of Coahuila, every other weekend, alternating with when he had to work distributing food among families and exploring all the border towns when he came upon the first organization to benefit from his charity and hard work.

"I found a children's orphanage that was out of everything except kids. The family that ran it explained they had ran this for 14 years, and for whatever reason, their sponsor was unable to take care of them. I [then] kept the place running every other weekend."

Eventually, people began to take notice of Decker's actions and decided to help. "People at my church—St. Joe's—and other [HPD] officers got involved and would go down with me to make trips," he explained. From there, Decker's operation—which was still-yet unnamed—took off. His Policemen's Union picked up on the story and provided funding to set up the organization that would become nonprofit charity Paper Houses Across the Border Inc.—or "Paper Houses," for short. "It was incredible," Decker said.

The newly christened organization quickly expanded in exactly the way its brief history dictated it would—as a result of Decker and Paper Houses' exploration.

"We went to Emiliano Zapata Elementary, which is on the side of a dirt road, to see if we could help with supplies. Again, we knew that the police officers would kick in if they needed [a great deal of supplies]."

Here, as in the first time he stumbled on a cardboard house sometime ago, the situation was much graver than he had ever feared possible.

"Three teachers told me the same thing independently of each other, in three separate rooms. Each teacher said, 'You know what we need more than supplies? We need some way to feed these children. They are passing out in class from hunger.

They can't focus in school because they are so hungry.' We started with 40 children—then 60—then 80. Then, a small church let us use their kitchen, and we were feeding 140 children," Decker said.

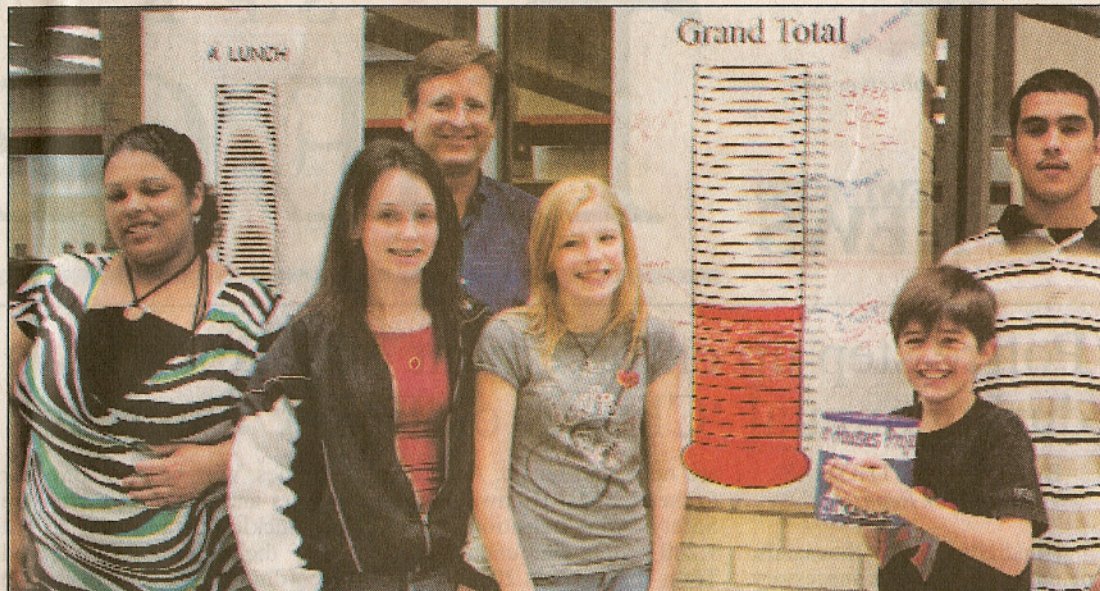

In November 2006, Paper Houses built a cafeteria for Zapata. At the time, according to Decker, that was the only school cafeteria in the entire state of Coahuila, which has a population of nearly 2.5 million people. "We were feeding 1,000 kids a day," he said. Less than six months later, Paper Houses built another cafeteria, this time at Garcia Morales Elementary, and another 1,000 kids were being fed a day there."

It was at this point in the charity's development that Bailey Middle got involved.

"It's something that inspires you: this is one man who saw a need," Vic Flowers said. "No one makes any money from it—every penny goes to food and medicine. The people who drive down there even pay for their own gas."

Decker agreed: "If someone mails in a dollar, that dollar literally goes to Mexico."

After Flowers talked to Vijil about it, Decker met with her and discussed the idea of speaking with her students about Paper Houses. "They have a dynamic principal over there at Bailey," Decker said of Vijil. He met with the students and explained the situation to them. "I told them, 'In order for me to feed eight children—a whole table—for an entire year, I need only $1,234. I'd love for you guys to sponsor a table." Decker said he left up to the students how to raise the money.

Bailey students are proud of surpassing their goal of collecting enough money to sponsor a table in a school cafeteria in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. From left are Ebony Washington, Sabrena Norris, faculty sponsor Vic Flowers, Morgan Hutchison, Ryan Luellen, Nick DeLeon and Trey Jeffries. Photo courtesy SISD

The response was overwhelming.

"The kids were all over it. What's great about this project is that it was kids helping kids. You could see a light in their eyes. It was really cool," Flowers said. He said that, in the school's daily assemblies, the kids were talked to about the charity and how important the cause is—along with how relatively close the problems are to home. "We talked to the children about what it would be like to not have food," he said. "We explained to them that, in America, we provide free lunches to those who cannot afford them. In Mexico, however, kids are passing out because of hunger."

They raised, according to Decker, $1,530. "With what was left over [after the $1,234 was taken out for the table,] I bought vitamins and medicine," he said, commending their efforts. "They were the first school in the U.S. to take this up." Bailey's faculty and staff got involved, too. "Several want to make a trip down there just for teachers," Decker said. He hopes Bailey's families will follow suit too. "The reason I set this up—the main purpose—was to help Americans. I want to do for them what's been done for me. It's been a life-altering experience. People keep coming back to help," he further explained.

Psychologists, teachers, parents, baby-sitters—virtually anybody who has dealt with them for extended periods will vehemently exclaim upon the selfishness of adolescents. Bailey Middle certainly provided a ringing example to the contrary.

For more information, view the Web site www.paperhouses.org

sparker@hcnonline.com

Middle school raises more than $1,500 for Paper Houses Across the Border

By SARAH PARKER
News Editor

Children have always aspired to live in huge houses. Now, the generation that's grown up seeing "MTV Cribs" desire even more immense houses with all the superfluties they've seen in their favorite celebrity's home. The students of Rickey C. Bailey Middle School were shown a much bleaker real estate reality than what they've seen on MTV, when they recently saw photographs of cardboard houses in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. Bob Decker, founder of Paper Houses Across the Borders, a nonprofit charity that aids the citizens in the "colonias"—or neighborhoods—of the border towns, held the assembly especially to ask the students for their aide. Bailey students rushed to respond, raising more than $1,500 in just two weeks, hundreds more than the $1,234 necessary for the charity to feed a school cafeteria table of eight elementary students for a year in the border town.

The charity first drew band director Vic Flowers' attention before he was even at Bailey. He heard of the program from the founder's daughter, Jennifer Hicks. When Flowers moved at the beginning of the school year, he immediately took his idea to principal Veronica Vijil. "I knew that she would listen. I felt that it fit our philosophy on campus. We teach our kids to help others and to appreciate what they have," Flowers, who was the faculty sponsor for the project, said.

HOUSES, 2A

The Lopez children use discarded van seat to sit on while they eat their only meal with meat in it for the past week. They are part of family consisting of four generations that shares a cluster of cardboard and cinderblock rooms.

HOUSES

Continued from page 1A

Bob Decker, a sergeant who has served 35 years in law enforcement, 25 of those in the Houston Police Department, was on vacation four years ago when he came upon his first "paper house," but he can remember every indelible detail of this sight, one that forever changed his life.

"I was driving around looking for a Mexican restaurant. I was on a dirt road, and I saw a woman cooking over a campfire wearing a long skirt. In the background I saw a cardboard house."

He didn't dare believe his eyes.

"I thought, 'Surely, she can't be living in that cardboard house.' Here I was only 2 miles away from the border [of Del Rio, Texas]," Decker exclaimed. "I pulled up the hill where it crested and saw hundreds of these cardboard houses."

Decker began returning to Ciudad Acuña, which is located in the Mexican state of Coahuila, every other weekend, alternating with when he had to work distributing food among families and exploring all the border towns when he came upon the first organization to benefit from his charity and hard work.

"I found a children's orphanage that was out of everything except kids. The family that ran it explained they had ran this for 14 years, and for whatever reason, their sponsor was unable to take care of them. I [then] kept the place running every other weekend."

Eventually, people began to take notice of Decker's actions and decided to help. "People at my church—St. Joe's—and other [HPD] officers got involved and would go down with me to make trips," he explained. From there, Decker's operation—which was still-yet unnamed—took off. His Policemen's Union picked up on the story and provided funding to set up the organization that would become nonprofit charity Paper Houses Across the Border Inc.—or "Paper Houses," for short. "It was incredible," Decker said.

The newly christened organization quickly expanded in exactly the way its brief history dictated it would—as a result of Decker and Paper Houses' exploration.

"We went to Emiliano Zapata Elementary, which is on the side of a dirt road, to see if we could help with supplies. Again, we knew that the police officers would kick in if they needed [a great deal of supplies]."

Here, as in the first time he stumbled on a cardboard house sometime ago, the situation was much graver than he had ever feared possible.

"Three teachers told me the same thing independently of each other, in three separate rooms. Each teacher said, 'You know what we need more than supplies? We need some way to feed these children. They are passing out in class from hunger.

They can't focus in school because they are so hungry.' We started with 40 children—then 60—then 80. Then, a small church let us use their kitchen, and we were feeding 140 children," Decker said.

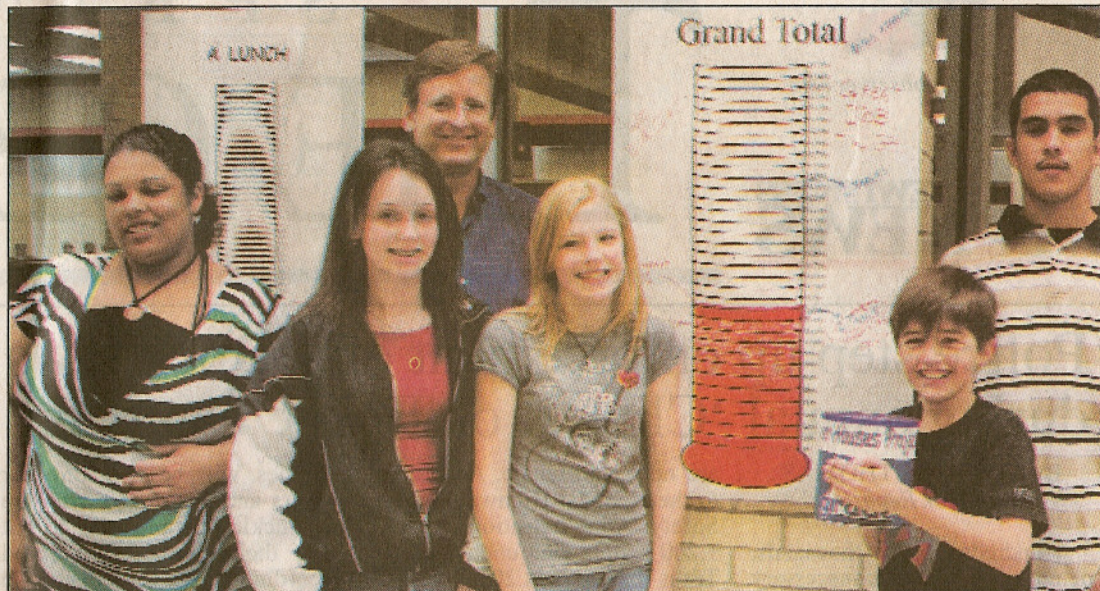

In November 2006, Paper Houses built a cafeteria for Zapata. At the time, according to Decker, that was the only school cafeteria in the entire state of Coahuila, which has a population of nearly 2.5 million people. "We were feeding 1,000 kids a day," he said. Less than six months later, Paper Houses built another cafeteria, this time at Garcia Morales Elementary, and another 1,000 kids were being fed a day there."

It was at this point in the charity's development that Bailey Middle got involved.

"It's something that inspires you: this is one man who saw a need," Vic Flowers said. "No one makes any money from it—every penny goes to food and medicine. The people who drive down there even pay for their own gas."

Decker agreed: "If someone mails in a dollar, that dollar literally goes to Mexico."

After Flowers talked to Vijil about it, Decker met with her and discussed the idea of speaking with her students about Paper Houses. "They have a dynamic principal over there at Bailey," Decker said of Vijil. He met with the students and explained the situation to them. "I told them, 'In order for me to feed eight children—a whole table—for an entire year, I need only $1,234. I'd love for you guys to sponsor a table." Decker said he left up to the students how to raise the money.

Bailey students are proud of surpassing their goal of collecting enough money to sponsor a table in a school cafeteria in Ciudad Acuña, Mexico. From left are Ebony Washington, Sabrena Norris, faculty sponsor Vic Flowers, Morgan Hutchison, Ryan Luellen, Nick DeLeon and Trey Jeffries. Photo courtesy SISD

The response was overwhelming.

"The kids were all over it. What's great about this project is that it was kids helping kids. You could see a light in their eyes. It was really cool," Flowers said. He said that, in the school's daily assemblies, the kids were talked to about the charity and how important the cause is—along with how relatively close the problems are to home. "We talked to the children about what it would be like to not have food," he said. "We explained to them that, in America, we provide free lunches to those who cannot afford them. In Mexico, however, kids are passing out because of hunger."

They raised, according to Decker, $1,530. "With what was left over [after the $1,234 was taken out for the table,] I bought vitamins and medicine," he said, commending their efforts. "They were the first school in the U.S. to take this up." Bailey's faculty and staff got involved, too. "Several want to make a trip down there just for teachers," Decker said. He hopes Bailey's families will follow suit too. "The reason I set this up—the main purpose—was to help Americans. I want to do for them what's been done for me. It's been a life-altering experience. People keep coming back to help," he further explained.

Psychologists, teachers, parents, baby-sitters—virtually anybody who has dealt with them for extended periods will vehemently exclaim upon the selfishness of adolescents. Bailey Middle certainly provided a ringing example to the contrary.

For more information, view the Web site www.paperhouses.org